A Well Regarded Merger

The markets favorably welcomed the combination between the French Essilor and the Italian Luxottica

East of Paris is located the headquarters of a French company that the Spanish consumer is not very familiar with: Essilor. The building is nice but not imposing. The offices are open and pleasant. However, no one would guess that these are the headquarters of such an important company, which has manufactured corrective lenses worn by nearly half of the glasses-wearing global population (including Spain's). In cooperation with the Italian company Luxottica, Essilor has just taken a leap forward to become the global leader in glasses, be they protective or corrective. The companies are behind well-known signature brands such as Varilux or Ray-Ban.

EssilorLuxottica is a European combination which promises more research, more development and some important gains. The joint business revenues amount to €15,500 million. Laurent Vacherot, Essilor's Deputy Chief Executive Officer, prefers to speak of it as a partnership rather than a business combination. “We have worked with Luxottica for a long time. It rather is a partnership agreement and we are not combining by necessity. There will be a natural evolution and little by little we will increasingly coordinate our actions.”

Additional Millions

The markets and the French government have welcomed the deal. The rating agency Moody's changed its rating from "stable" to "positive" and the investment bank UBS has advised purchasing Essilor shares given their strong growth potential. UBS estimates that the combination will yield an additional 500 million in synergies annually by 2021.

Following the combination, the resulting company, EssilorLuxottica, would rank seventh in the Paris stock-market capitalization, with a market capitalization of approximately €50,000 million. “It’s a source of European pride”, said Les Echos Economics professor and expert in competition François Lévêque. This time around it is not an American or Asian company taking over a European firm.

The significant advantage of this merger is that Essilor and Luxottica are complementary rather than competitors. Essilor engages in research and development and manufactures lenses. Through Varilux, it is a pioneer in progressive lenses, and now its firm Eyezen develops special glass lenses to mitigate the harm of digital devices on the eyesight, explains Ernesto Díaz, vice-president for Western Europe, which includes Spain. “We work on the eyesight correction, but also on protection against the rays that could end up damaging the retina,” adds Vacherot at Essilor’s Parisian headquarters, which will also be the post-combination corporate headquarters. “This combination”, Díaz says, “has tremendous growth potential in Spain with prescription sunglasses, which are still not widely used due to the users’ lack of awareness.”

Vacherot agrees with Lévêque’s statement that the combination between both companies, in addition to maintaining employment, will benefit consumers because of better prices, more sophisticated products and greater speed in delivering eyeglasses to final users.

Essilor was created in the 19th century by an association of small manufacturers of glasses (Essel) which merged with a company called Silor in 1972. Today it is present in some 100 countries and nearly half of the lenses sold throughout the world are Essilor’s. Luxottica came into existence 56 years ago in Agordo, near Venice. It is the product of entrepreneur Leonardo Del Vecchio. It is a family business which specializes in fashion eyeglasses (sunglasses, luxury and sports eyewear). In addition to its own brands; it has licenses to operate brands such as Chanel, Burberry, Giorgio Armani, Dolce & Gabbana and Bulgari.

Networks in 150 Countries

Luxottica has a sales network in 150 countries. Its shares are listed in Milan but also in Wall Street because, like Essilor, its first market is North America. In fact, 54% of the profits earned by both giants come from this region of the world.

The potential market is 100% of the global population, 7 billion people. Of the 4.5 billion people who require corrective lenses, only 1.9 billion own them, according to the companies, and only 1.4 billion own sunglasses or sports glasses. “This is a young and very fragmented market” Vacherot affirms. “Hence its major growth potential.”
