COHEN & STEERS QUALITY INCOME REALTY FUND, INC.

April 22, 2002

To Our Shareholders:

We are pleased to submit to you our first report for the period ended March 31, 2002. The net asset value per common share at that date was $15.00. The Fund commenced operations on February 28, 2002 and as of March 31, 2002 had net assets of $565.7 million and was 89% invested. Subsequent to quarter end, the underwriters' final over-allotment was exercised, and the Fund now has 38.4 million common shares outstanding. The Fund also declared $0.105 per share monthly dividends payable to common shareholders of record on April 15, 2002, May 15, 2002, and June 14, 2002.

In addition, on April 4, 2002, the Fund issued $280 million in Taxable Auction Market Preferred Shares. The proceeds of this issue, which received a 'AAA/aaa' rating from Standard & Poor's and Moody's, will be used to make additional investments in real estate securities. In order to lock in the dividend rate on a significant portion of the Taxable Auction Market Preferred Shares financing, the Fund thereafter entered into interest rate swaps with a notional value of $210 million.

INVESTMENT REVIEW

REIT performance, in general, continued to excel in the first quarter, with the averages reaching new highs and substantially outdistancing all of the major stock market indexes. Every REIT property sector advanced in the first quarter, with the best performance being turned in by the Hotel sector, which was up 26.2%, as investors anticipated a strong rebound in this most economically sensitive sector. The Regional Mall sector (+11.9%) performed well for similar reasons, and because of its consistent earnings growth during the recent period of economic weakness. The weakest sectors in the quarter were Apartment (+4.4%), which began the year at a very high relative valuation, and Office (+5.2%), whose fundamentals are not generally expected to respond as quickly to renewed economic growth.

More than ever, it appears that investors have begun to accept REITs as an asset class. Already this year, flows into real estate mutual funds have reached a five-year high. REIT equity issuance was about $2.5 billion in the first quarter, up from $356 million in first quarter 2001. REIT bond issuance, however, at $2.0 billion, was down 47% from last year's $3.8 billion. Some observers compare recent trends to those of the mid-1990's REIT bull market. We, however, believe today's environment is completely different. That previous bull market was the result of a unique cyclical growth opportunity: REITs were able to acquire property from distressed owners at attractive prices and to finance those acquisitions at favorable terms. Today, by contrast, despite ready access to debt and equity capital, REITs have found opportunities to grow via acquisitions scarce, as real estate, having been redistributed in the previous cycle, is generally held in very strong hands. In addition, because of the economic slowdown and the decline in the demand for space, there are very few new development opportunities that make economic sense.

COHEN & STEERS QUALITY INCOME REALTY FUND, INC.

In our opinion, the recent change in investor sentiment toward REITs is the result of the steady performance of property investments during the economic slowdown, and the ability of REITs to maintain earnings and dividend growth in more challenging times. The performance of REITs is in marked contrast to the decline in overall stock market values over the past two years and to the record decline in corporate profits registered in 2001. Indeed, the past several years have clearly demonstrated the portfolio diversification benefits of REITs.

In addition, there appears to be a renewed focus on income as a primary source of investment return. As investors have reduced their long-term return expectations for many major asset classes, the attractiveness of REIT dividends has never been greater. At the beginning of the year, the current yield of REITs (7.4%) far exceeded that offered by all other equities and was higher than many fixed-income investments. Unlike fixed-income investments, however, REITs offer the possibility of growth-and, as the following table demonstrates, REIT dividend growth over the past three years has been substantial. Nearly every one of the 50 largest REITs (which in total represent about 75% of the market capitalization of the REIT universe) increased its dividend per share over the past two years. Excluding Hotel REITs, which were the casualties of last year's unusual decline in travel, the REIT dividend record is nearly perfect, with only one company reducing its dividend in each of the past two years. Further, thus far in 2002, 20 companies, or 40% of this group, have already increased their dividend payouts. Considering that the past two years were weak for real estate fundamentals, one can only imagine the dividend growth potential of REITs in the economic and real estate upturns that we envision for late-2002 and beyond.

In a partial reversal of last year's experience, the performance gap between the higher-yielding, smaller-cap companies and the lower-yielding, larger-cap companies has begun to close. While all sectors produced strong positive returns in the quarter, it appears that the faster-growing companies have begun to outperform the higher-yielding companies. This is logical, considering that interest rates, whose low levels caused investors to flock to the higher-yielding companies last year, have begun to rise in 2002. Further, it appears that the more recession-resistant sectors have begun to underperform, possibly the result of investors believing that the recession may be over. For example, community center owners returned 6.4% in the quarter, versus 11.4% for the mall owners. The largest companies have yet to uniformly become market-performance leaders; however, we believe that as the economic and real estate recoveries progress, leadership by the larger companies should resume.

INVESTMENT OUTLOOK

It may seem ironic that the strong performance of REITs has coincided with evidence that real estate fundamentals continue to deteriorate. Vacancy rates for every property type are expected to rise for much of this year, as the delivery of new space is greater than the demand for space. Furthermore, some observers have suggested that in some regions the Office sector may not begin to recover until 2004. As a result, many analysts have reduced their earnings growth estimates for both 2002 and 2003. Rising interest rates might well reverse the trends of the past year, whereby REITs had access to low-cost debt capital and investors were attracted to the group's above-average dividend yields. Compounding this situation is the fact that, as a result of their outstanding performance, the share prices of many REITs are believed by some to now exceed their underlying asset values. In fact, some analysts' most optimistic return expectations for 2002 have been met in just the first quarter; as a result, these analysts are now recommending the sale of REIT stocks.

It is also ironic that REITs, which have proven themselves to be star performers during and after economic slowdowns, are expected by many to underperform during economic recoveries. The argument is that in a rebounding economy better relative growth can be found in industrial and technology companies. In contrast, we believe that investors look further out. In our opinion, the market is looking for signs of renewed economic growth and improved property fundamentals beyond the immediate future. Indeed, there are some very substantial signs that the economy may be entering a phase of very strong growth. In addition, the economic slowdown has also led to a slowdown in construction. Thus, while it may take time for some property markets to return to a better supply/demand balance, the process of getting there is already underway. We fully expect that earnings growth will accelerate once absorption turns positive.

Perhaps the most important issue to reconcile regards valuation. While many believe that REIT share prices are higher than their net asset values (NAVs) by about 5%-10%, there is no other measure that even suggests that REITs are overvalued. REIT stocks, trading on average at less than 10x this year's expected earnings, are near the bottom of their historical multiple range. Compared to other financial-market instruments, REITs continue to look extremely cheap. Indeed, the S&P 500 Index, trading at 23x earnings, is at the upper end of its historical range, while the NASDAQ multiple is simply stratospheric. Even with the recent rise in interest rates, the cost of borrowing remains near a record low. Furthermore, the gap in yields between REITs and Treasuries is still at the upper end of its historical range. And, although REIT dividend yields are in the middle of their long-term range, their payout ratios are at an all-time low. Additionally, the gap between interest rates and the widely accepted real estate capitalization rates (real estate income as a percentage of asset value) is the widest it has been in over 30 years, at about 4.5 percentage points. If cap rates were to decline by as little as 50 basis points, NAVs would rise by about 12%, turning today's perceived NAV premium into a discount.

The only way we can reconcile the NAV measure with all of the other valuation measures is to conclude that many analysts' calculations of real estate values are not realistic. Most assets, particularly real estate, must be valued based on current and future income in relation to the cost of capital. Assuming that we are entering a period of economic recovery that leads to rising occupancies, rental rates, and net income, property values should be expected to rise over the next several years. In addition, investors are likely to put a premium on the ability of REITs to generate income that grows consistently, with low volatility. Indeed, as venture capital, private equity, and technology investments have failed to produce adequate risk-adjusted returns, we believe core property investments are likely to become a mainstay in many diversified portfolios.

As real estate returns to favor, we expect that REITs will be the investment choice for many. We believe that the modern REIT era is entering its second wave of growth, having come through the first by delivering superior returns, professional management, quality property portfolios, and a high degree of investor liquidity. While we cannot ignore the fact that REIT share prices have come a long way over the past two years, we believe that the long-term outlook for this sector remains extremely bright.

Sincerely,

MARTIN COHEN
