HealthSouth again seeks partner in digital hospital

HealthSouth Corp. is again looking for a partner in the Birmingham hospital market to share ownership of its hospital under construction on U.S. 280, the company's chief restructuring officer confirmed Wednesday.

HealthSouth doesn't need money from the partner to complete the hospital, and the company will open it alone if need be, Bryan Marsal said. But the U.S. 280 hospital would be stronger if HealthSouth aligned itself with a local hospital system for which running acute care hospitals is its main line of business, he said.

HealthSouth's main business is outpatient surgery and rehabilitation centers, and it owns only two acute care hospitals.

"A system provides you with a lot of clout," Marsal said. "We're not part of a system now. ... The issue is: Would you want to own 100 percent of a successful enterprise or 50 percent of a very, very successful enterprise? It will be profitable either way."

Marsal would not say with whom HealthSouth is discussing the joint venture, but he said Baptist Health System, UAB Health System, St. Vincent's Hospital and Brookwood Medical Center all have "strategic systems" that would make them attractive to HealthSouth for such a deal.

Stronger now:

After being a hit by an accounting scandal last year, the for-profit HealthSouth had announced it was looking for a partner in the $300 million hospital project. Later, HealthSouth said it would go it alone. What's changed, Marsal said, is that HealthSouth is no longer at risk of bankruptcy and can now negotiate from a place of strength. Last year potential partners negotiated as if it were a fire sale, he said.

"We got frustrated with that conduct and said, 'You know what? We're not going to let you pick our pocket,'" Marsal said.

In March 2003, the federal government announced a probe into alleged fraud in HealthSouth's accounting practices. Since then, HealthSouth has discovered up to $4.6 billion of overstatements and errors in its financial statements, but Marsal said the company is strong and has $700 million in the bank.

"I think, for all practical purposes, we're through the storm," he said.

Marsal's comments came Wednesday morning in Montgomery after the state's Certificate of Need Review Board met to discuss which board members had conflicts of interest on an upcoming hearing involving HealthSouth. Last year, Brookwood and Baptist asked the board to revoke the certificate of need for HealthSouth's new hospital because they said the permission was granted based on phony financial statements.

Lawsuit pending:

That hearing has been postponed until June and may not happen then because the board asked both sides to consider having an administrative law judge handle the matter. However, Baptist withdrew from the case Wednesday afternoon, after pursuing it with Brookwood since 2002.

"We re-evaluated the lawsuit and determined that at this time the system is not well served by dedicating resources in this manner," Baptist CEO Beth O'Brien said in a written statement. "Therefore, we are withdrawing."

Brookwood plans to continue its challenge to HealthSouth's CON.

"We can't really comment as to why Baptist has made this decision, but we are moving forward," said Debbie Hollenstein, Brookwood's spokeswoman. "We still feel that the merits of the case are strong."

A spokeswoman for Baptist said the hospital system is not in discussions with HealthSouth.

Marsal was less definitive. He said he could not say why Baptist withdrew from the case, but he did say, "It's kind of tough when you sue your potential partner."

A lawsuit filed recently in federal court in Philadelphia against Baptist by a former consultant also mentioned that Baptist had been in negotiations with a publicly traded hospital company. In Birmingham, that could be only HealthSouth or Brookwood, which is owned by Tenet Healthcare Corp. Baptist has declined to comment on specifics of that suit.

When HealthSouth was looking for a partner last year on its new hospital, it named UAB and St. Vincent's as contenders.

Little insight offered:

But those two systems gave little insight Wednesday into their interest in a joint venture with HealthSouth. St. Vincent's declined to comment altogether. A spokesman for UAB said, "UAB from time to time has meaningful discussions with other health care organizations and has joint relationships with many. It's our practice to neither confirm nor deny any specific discussions"

Tenet, Brookwood's parent company, is perhaps the least likely partner for HealthSouth. While Brookwood is the closest hospital to HealthSouth's new facility, California-based Tenet is selling hospitals rather than buying them because of problems brought on by multiple federal probes into the company's billing and other practices at hospitals outside Alabama.
