At the annual meeting, the remarks of Arthur Sulzberger, Jr., chairman, the Company, and publisher, The New York Times, included statements regarding The Boston Globe, a part of the Company's New England Media Group. He noted that The Boston Globe had been dramatically affected by secular and cyclical forces affecting the media industry and that the Company had responded by consolidating printing facilities, raising circulation prices and reducing headcount. He also stated that further action would be required and that, as had been reported, management and The Boston Globe's unions are engaged in extensive negotiations.

For 2009, the Company projects that operating losses at The Boston Globe and boston.com will be approximately $85 million, before savings from labor negotiations or other cost-cutting initiatives or the effects of any revenue initiatives.
