Bob Jones, Old National Bancorp President and Chief Executive Officer:

As I walked in and was talking to shareholders someone said, "You're using all our money to buy banks and our stock hasn't done anything. I understand that, but let me explain why we're doing that and why we think it's the best for shareholders in the future."

Finally, we did announce last year the potential partnership with United Bancorp up in Ann Arbor, Michigan. Ann Arbor may be the best mid-size market in the Midwest. Unemployment is below 5%. It's a great economy. There's a mixture of technology, service-based businesses, and that school up north for those of us from Ohio, and I may be the only one, but the University of Michigan is based there. It is a dynamite market and much like in Fort Wayne, we've got great people. We also have great products opportunity that we can export to that as well. So, we're very excited to be in Ann Arbor. We're very excited to have the United Bancorp partnership with us.

So, to get to the question "Why do we do the partnerships? Why are they so important to the future of your Company?" It does improve the growth dynamics of your Company, and by moving into markets like Columbus, Fort Wayne, Bloomington, Ann Arbor, Kalamazoo—it changes the growth dynamics. Those are very good growth markets. Last year as I said, our Bloomington, Indiana market was our second most profitable market in the franchise and one of our largest growth markets in terms of loan production. I think Wendell is going to give Bloomington a real run for the money here pretty quickly, but those are great things. The challenge Sara Miller has here in Evansville is that we're pretty big and we've got a lot of share. It's hard to grow a lot in a city like Evansville when you have almost 40% market share. She's going to do it, but it's much harder to do. In a market like Fort Wayne, where you're new, it allows us to grow, and again, the markets are growing and the unemployment is much better. So, obviously if you can grow the top line, you're going to improve earnings and the more we earn, the more the stock should go up. The other part is really to improve the efficiency as I talked about. It's not just reducing costs, but it's allowing us to take some of the things we have in these franchises that we don't have now. You think about in Fort Wayne, they are the HSA of health savings accounts leader in Indiana. They have the state of Indiana as an account. They are the leading provider of health savings accounts. Guess what? Now Old National is.

As you think about our partnership up in Ann Arbor—a tremendous small business program, and we're very excited to export that out across our franchise. Great mortgage opportunities—they've got a great mortgage business. So, when we go into these partnerships, and we call them partnerships for a reason—because 1 + 1 has to equal 3—we're looking for opportunities to continue to become more efficient and also get new talent. Spend two seconds with Chad or Wendell—that's why you do partnerships. These guys are first class and we're just proud to have them on our team. You get upgrades—you get great people—and that's part of the partnership. The one point I don't have on this slide is in today's environment, you have to get bigger to deal with compliance costs and the other challenges that come.

If you look at this map, you probably can't read the cities, but if you look at the dots, you can see in 2004 where we were and then where we are today. If you overlaid the growth dynamics of these markets, it's a pretty impressive story. We've really moved from slower growth markets to higher growth markets and it's really changed the growth dynamics of your Company. Now, I will tell you, it doesn't mean we aren't concerned about cities like Paoli and Loogootee—we love those markets, places like Carbondale—we do a great job with Southern Illinois University—we do a great job in Carbondale, it's an important market, but again, it's not growing as fast as Kalamazoo is growing. You can see the changes in the markets.
