The future of ATMs

Andy Mattes, CEO of Diebold, says the ATMs of tomorrow will replace human bank tellers.

Transcript of Interview with CEO Andy Mattes for CNBC

Karen Tso: Let me ask you about ATMs and just where they are in 2016. Because we've got a whole bunch of disruption happening from online payments, other types of payments from mobile wallets. Do you still see the same level of growth, or are ATMs also going to be disrupted much like branches were disrupted by ATMs?

Andy Mattes: As a matter of fact, ATMs are the main driver for change in the branch. We help banks to drive to what's called branch automation. We help them to connect to all type of payments. It's called omnichannel solutions.

If you think about it, there's roughly 12,000 startups in the FinTech industry. Who do banks turn to to find their way for true North in how to embrace new software opportunities? It's companies like ourselves. So we will be the trusted advisor. We'll be the powerhouse in our industry. And we help our customers, the banks, to transform as their customers are changing.

Karen Tso: As a customer, we spend a lot of time with the teller these days. It's a main interface with the bank. Do you see the teller doing more for us down the track? Can the ATM actually deliver more than just give us cash and give us a receipt?

Andy Mattes: The ATM of tomorrow is going to replace the teller. It can do approximately 90% of what the human being can do. And it's going to be your branch in a box. You're going to be putting money into the machine. You're going to be able to do car loans on the machine. So you're going to be able to open accounts on the machine, and by the way, get your bank card right there and then.

Karen Tso: What do you mean we could do car loans on an ATM? How does that work? Because there's a ton of paperwork if you want to go and get a car loan out.

Andy Mattes: That's the exciting thing. The new machines will identify yourself. You can put your passport on it. You can put—they can scan documents. You can literally do everything online that you would have been able to do in front of a human being. And for the banks, at a fraction of the cost. A transaction at the teller costs you around about $0.65. A transaction at the machine is $0.08.

Stephen Sedgwick: Look, I think this is really interesting time for you to be over here as well. You're a long way from Ohio. And are you going to get your deal? That's the point. Are you going to get this acceptance up to 75% support levels.

I think, Andy, you've said pretty much we are not going lower than 75%. But you haven't got an anchor shareholder backing you at the moment. They're holding off. What are they holding off for? More money?

Andy Mattes: No, this is just a normal game. The professional money tenders in the last 48 to 24 hours. We just been on the road trip. I've spoken to approximately 50% of the capital in Wincor. Every one of the shareholders is extremely excited. One of the shareholders gave me a great quote, which is, this is the deal that needed to happen for the industry. We're very confident we're going to get the deal over the goal line.

Stephen Sedgwick: I think it is the deal that the industry needs, as well. But I think it's more of a defensive point of view, perhaps, than what you explained to Karen there as well, if I may say so. I think branch closures are happening aggressively. I think automation means that people don't want so much physical.

And I think you agree with that in some ways, because software and services, I know that that's something you're looking at rather than just traditional ATMs as well. So in order to get on board and help these multitude of people, whether it be Apple Pay, whether it be Blockchain, you name it, I think you do need this deal as well. But do the shareholders, you think they're on board as well, and you think the synergies are going to be enough to convince them to do it?

Andy Mattes: Synergies are extremely exciting. We're talking about $160 million. They're on the cost side. We've got good line of sight to generating those synergies. Shareholders are very much exciting. It's a great premium, it's a great opportunity.

And it provides a transformation for the company. More than $3 billion of our combined revenue going forward is going to come from services and software. Very predictable revenue streams, and very transformative and very sticky with the customer base.
