Here's a question. "How do you make life online better for more people?"

Well, you extend Net Neutrality protection to more Americans in cities across the country, to ensure an open Internet.

When the Internet is free and open, it stimulates competition and innovation.

That's better for everyone.

How else can life online get better?

Faster speeds, more security and reliability for more people.

And of course, make it more accessible to more low-income families, with programs like Internet Essentials, so everyone can connect to broadband Internet at home.

More Internet access makes it easier to find jobs and information, and to do schoolwork. That's better opportunity.

Comcast is investing billions to build the broadband network of the future. Through the transaction with Time Warner Cable we can help make life online better for more people.

Comcast and Time Warner Cable. Together is better for more people.
